9am Briefing: Firm steps in to help troubled care homes

Published Date: 25 July 2011

A LOTHIAN care home operator has stepped in to save 11 homes run by trouble-hit Southern Cross.

Multi-millionaire Robert Kilgour, who runs three homes in Edinburgh and Musselburgh, said he had been approached by landlords of the 11 properties - including one in Edinburgh - to ensure continuity of care after Southern Cross, which ran the homes, announced the company was to close. For the full story see today's Evening News.

- SHARES in Wolfson Microelectronics have continued their five-month descent, dropping a further 10.7 per cent after the company cut its sales forecast.

The Edinburgh-based audio chip maker said it had become "increasingly cautious" as more and more of its customers were losing out to rival Apple. Yesterday it said its full-year revenue would grow by less than ten per cent, missing analysts' expectations.

- ONE of the last surviving examples of the country's aviation manufacturing industry has been gifted to the nation by one of Scotland's most prominent noblemen.

Angus Douglas-Hamilton, the 15th Duke of Hamilton, who died last year, was a long-serving test pilot for "Bulldog" military training aircraft, some 320 of which were built near Prestwick Airport in Ayrshire.

Now the late Duke's widow, Kay, has donated a prototype plane - which was bought by the Duke and flown regularly at the Museum of Flight airshow in his native East Lothian - to take pride of place at the new look National Museum of Scotland.
